Turning the “flat world” into the real world for Michigan education:

There’s a lot of talk these days about the “flat world” of the 21st century. At the same time many of those who are interested in the flat world phenomenon are saying that our students need more math, reading, language arts and science to compete in the new global economy in which they will have to compete. This discussion is all well and good except for one point: our students (and many adults) don’t understand what is meant by the “flat world.” All too few have an understanding of the global economy, let alone their future role and the impact of “the flat world” on them.

Investing in Michigan

The Michigan Council on Economic Education was created more than 25 years ago to protect the quality of teaching of our free enterprise economic system. We focus on two key education principles: teachers cannot teach what they do not know, and students cannot learn what they are not taught.

MCEE teaches Michigan teachers about 21st century globalization so they are prepared to teach and positively impact our state’s young people. We support economic education with sound academic research.

MCEE strives to assure that each citizen is economically literate, preparing them to be productive and responsible citizens, voters, producers, consumers, savers and investors. In today’s world, that means a thorough understanding and appreciation of the global economy and marketplace.

The alternative is to leave our schools and educators unprotected from attacks by authors, publishers, organizations, media and citizens who have an “agenda” ignoring the fact that all choices have consequences.
